Re: Jane Gibson

Operative received instructions to go to Hoboken to interview Mrs. Seibert formerly Mrs. Solidor, who is the woman mentioned in the letter which was sent to the editor of the Graphic.

Called at her home, but found no one there after making three attempts. At 4 P.M. found Mr. Seibert in and he informed me that Mrs. Seibert is away visiting some friends, but would be home after 6 P.M. Operative told him he would return about 7 or 8 P.M.

At 8:15 P.M. Operative found Mrs. Seibert at home. She was asked if she remembers the Eisleitner family and she replied that she does and that they were a low and common class of people who lived across the street from her on Washington Street between Newark and Ferry St and occupied the basement of the house. She could not remember the address. Mrs. Seibert is an elderly lady of refined type, but her memory is not very clear. She further stated that she had heard it rumored around that Mary Eisleitner had about 5 husbands and also heard that she was a singer in a dance hall in Hoboken on Washington St.

Mrs. Seibert also stated that she went to church the day Mrs. Eisleitner, the mother of Jane Gibson, married Charles Cerenuor. Mrs. Seibert stated that "the old lady is a decent sort of woman and a hard worker and that her first husband, Charles Eisleitner, was a drunkard and it was necessary for the old lady to work to help support the family. She also stated that Minnie, the oldest daughter seems to be a decent sort of person and a hard worker. She often heard people talking about Mary Eisleitner being a bad actor.

Mrs. Seibert was not able to recall anything of interest which might have happened to the Eisleitner family but believes that Mary Eisleitner married Fred Kesserling, but did not come around her mother's home very much. Mrs. Seibert was not able to furnish further information.

Operative then made inquiries in the neighborhood where they used to live, but could not find anyone who remembered them.

Respectfully submitted:
